This finding suggests that in our case study, articles that would eventually become highly cited were roughly equally likely to be desk-rejected as a random submission. Although editors and reviewers appear to be able to improve predictions of which articles will receive the most citations—if not while also improving scientific output via selection and gestation—both errors of omission and commission were prominent in our case studies. In our dataset, submissions were rejected and 62 were accepted.

Most articles received similar boilerplate text in their rejection letters. Desk-rejected articles eventually published in other journals received fewer citations than those that went through at least one round of peer review before rejection. Of course, it is impossible to observe counterfactuals for meritorious rejected articles that were scooped, severely revised, never published, or consigned to an obscure publication outlet.

UnivofChicagoPress;Chicago:Repeated time-consuming rejections at other journals are also likely an indicator of the true quality of a manuscript, as authors tend to send an article further down the journal status hierarchy after each rejection
