Six concrete buttresses fly out over the level and link the curving blue wall with its opposing wall consisting of viaduct like arches in which are set escalators to take passengers to the platform level of the station. While still in his twenties, he established himself as an executive with London Transport and set to work creating the London of his dreams, at once a futuristic city and a vast medieval village with public transportation as its lifeblood.

The need to build the station on a small site nestled between a council housing estate and a park made him confront, for the first time, the willfulness of the movement in which he had played such a conservative role. The time is right for more inductive definitions of modernist enterprises; scholarship like Saler's enables better descriptions and fewer prescriptions.

The "periscope" which is composed of small glass tiles repeats some of the glass of the "Warrior of the Kingdom":
