But what I find sad is that while he asks his reader not to forget all the tragedies the world has witnessed -- for most of us, only at a distance, with the smells and the horror filtered through the cable news -- I don't think Dispatches from the Edge: A Memoir of War can really make myself think about these sad and unnecessary losses except in short spurts. It wasn't until I decided to finish it and got to the chapter on Katrina that I began to see how much Cooper cares about the people behind the stories and how the tragedies of others have helped him deal with Dispatches from the Edge: A Memoir of War in his own life.
