Autism is not an impenetrable wall You try to relate to your autistic child, and the child doesn't respond. If, when we are free of such thinking, we still feel sadness when our child dies, that feeling will be in accordance with Nature – and hence something it is permitted to feel. Therefore, it is not just psychologically difficult, or too demanding an expectation, but actually proof of a moral failing if you fail to grieve. Shouldweswallourpain? Your world is not very open to us, and we won't make it without your strong support. Wikipedia has an article about: I invite you to look at our autism, and look at your grief, from our perspective: Butitcanbedone--unlessnon-autisticpeoplearefarmorelimitedthanwear is important, so take a moment to consider it: This is the same thing that parents experience when a child is stillborn, or when they have their baby to hold for a short time, only to have it die in infancy.
