How the García Girls Lost Their Accents by Julia Alvarez

García Márquez was sitting at his desk at the far end of the studio. . One night a friend lent me a book of short stories by Franz Kafka. a political leader, Gaitan, was shot and the people of Bogotá went raving mad in the streets. .. I wrote this in my notebook: "My favorite moment in life is when I give my dog a fresh bone.

One night a friend lent me a book of short stories by Franz Kafka. It details the POV of daughters and parents, because they each had a different experience. Garcia sisters, Carla, Sandra, Yolanda, and Sofia move to the United States after their father gets into trouble with the Dominican Republic's secret police.

This led me to Ebla and Amin who are trying to make ease at for themselves as women. When I wrote my first short stories I was told they had Joycean influences. What was being written then was mostly about life in the countryside and social life. Although students can read it as a whole class, I feel students should read it independently.
