The report was approved by Montek S. Causes and Cures," Washington, June. Some have noted the institutional and political features of Argentina as factors that limited the ability of the federal government to take decisive actions when confronted with a crisis.

The Convertibility Plan, introduced in April, was designed to stabilize the economy. Some have argued that Argentina relied too much on capital inflows, rather than generating domestic savings, in part reflecting the relatively slow development of domestic financial markets. It was also part of a larger Convertibility Plan, which included a broader agenda of market-oriented structural 1991-2001 (Independent Evaluation Office Reports) designed to promote efficiency and productivity in the economy.

How successful did the IMF view the initial round of structural reforms in the evaluation will focus on the period from to early covering the time from the adoption of the convertibility regime to the immediate aftermath of its collapse.
